Isaiah crowell injury report

Oakland Raiders running back Isaiah Crowell will miss the entire 2019 season after tearing his Achilles during a team workout on Tuesday, reports ESPN.com's Adam Schefter. Crowell signed a one-year deal last month that could be worth as much as $2.5 million. The 26-year-old Crowell played his first four seasons with the Cleveland Browns and spent last season with the New York Jets. He ran for 685 yards and six touchdowns in 2018, including a Jets franchise record and career-high 219 yards in a 34-16 victory over the Denver Broncos in Week 5. There are now three healthy running backs on Oakland's roster including Josh Jacobs, whom they selected in the first round of last week's draft. Zaleski/Associated Press Oakland Raiders running back Isaiah Crowell is reportedly expected to miss the entire 2019 season after suffering a torn Achilles during a team practice Monday, According to ESPN's Adam Schefter. Crowell had signed a one-year deal with the Raiders and was slated for a role after the departures of Marshawn Lynch and Doug Martin. With Crowell on the shelf, the door is wide open for 2019 first-round pick Josh Jacobs to be the clock cow in Oakland, while Jalen Richard will likely find into the mix as the third down, pass-catcher back. The 26-year-old Crowell spent the first four seasons of his career with the Cleveland Browns before joining the New York Jets last season. In 13 games (six starts), he finished with 685 rushing yards and six touchdowns. His 4.8 yards per carry tied a career high, and he was also one of the best backs in the league at picking up yards after contact: PFF OAK Raiders @PFF_Raiders According to @AdamSchefter, #Raiders RB Isaiah Crowell will miss the 2019 season with an injury he sustained Monday. Crowell's 3.27 yards rushing per attempt ranked 10th among 55 running backs with 100+ touchdowns in 2018. Best season came in 2016 with the Browns, running for 952 yards and seven touchdowns while catching 40 passes for 319 yards. Crowell would probably have been Jacobs' primary backup in 2019. Now Jacobs will largely have first and second down all for himself unless Chris Warren III bounces back from a knee injury and has another big preseason. Oakland could dip into the free-agent market and maybe even re-sign Martin after he played pretty well last season in rushing for 723 yards and four touchdowns. Either way, with Crowell's injury eliminating any possibility of a timeshare in Oakland, Jacobs could appear on fantasy radars as a potential first-round pick or an early second-round pick. Signed a one-year, $1 million contract with the Raiders in March 2019. Crowell was expected to compete to start the running back job in Oakland after signing a one-year contract worth up to $2.5 million this offseason, but he underwent surgery to repair a torn Achilles in early May and will spend the 2019 campaign on injured reserve. There's a chance Crowell will land elsewhere in 2020 when he returns to full health, especially given the Raiders' decision to select Alabama product Josh Jacobs with the 24th. Crowell averaged 4.8 yards per carry and added six touchdowns on the ground during his solitary season with the Jets in 2018, but the 26-year-old has yet to record a 1,000-yard rushing campaign. The Browns made it clear in the offseason that they intended to upgrade their backfield - eventually signing Carlos Hyde and draftee Nick Chubb - so Crowell took the hint and signed with the Jets as a free agent. Although he's not the most dynamic runner and failed to put together a 1,000-yard season in Cleveland, he never missed a game in four years and gives the Jets a stable presence at the top of the depth chart, something they had lacked with Matt Forte. Crowell's best asset is his acceleration, as he hits holes and quickly gets to the second level, but then lacks the top speed or elusiveness to take full advantage. He showed glimpses of three-down potential in 2016 and could produce interesting numbers if he gets more opportunities as a receiver, but more likely he will be in a timeshare alongside Bilal Powell, with coach Todd Bowles riding hot hand. The 24-year-old put together his best NFL campaign in 2016, running for nearly 1,000 yards while making a difference in the passing game, and as a by Crowell Crowell head into this season firmly established as No.1 back in Cleveland. Although he didn't have much of a reputation as a game-breaker until last year, he finished in the top 10 in the league in runs of 15 yards or more and average yards after contact per touch, a combination that led him to a career-high 4.8 YPC. It's possible Crowell needed some time to mature after a checkered college career that saw him kicked out of Georgia because of off-field issues. On the pitch he shows good vision and patience, and although he has no elite speed or elusiveness, he has an outburst to get to the second level when he finds a hole. The insult around him does him no favors, although the Browns signed guard Kevin Zeitler away from the Bengals to upgrade an offensive line that was already the team's relative strength. Duke Johnson reckons to have a key role in passing downs and as a chance-of-pace runner, but Crowell managed four 100-yard games last year under similar circumstances and if he remains focused and motivated he should be able to produce again. If you're looking for splashy highlight player, Crowell is not your guy. Of the 34 RBs that topped 1,000 total rushing yards combined the last two collective seasons, Crowell has the fourth-worst average rush (3.94). He's a meat-and-potatoes back, someone who seems to find some daylight between tackles, take what's available and get to the ground. Remember, you can accrue a modest amount of fantasy value if you do it enough times. Crowell has landed just inside the top 30 in basic scoring at RB over the past two years, grinding along in his unexciting fashion. He has increased his haul with 13 touchdowns. The Browns will probably use Crowell and Duke Johnson like they did last year, but we're a little more excited about that duo because Hue Jackson - a famous rushing-game whisperer - has taken over the. Crowell was a free agent last year and found himself consistent in the second half of the season after the Browns gave up Ben Tate. He formed a sufficient backfield tandem with fellow rookie Terrence West, using his vision and elusiveness to rip off some big runs while West did dirty work in the trenches. Crowell doesn't break many tackles or run away from tackles, and he's not an asset as a receiver or in pass protection, but he's hard to square up and can use his impressive first burst to get to the second level. He should also benefit from running behind a good offensive line, albeit one that struggles to allow penetration last season. Cleveland used a third-round pick on Duke Johnson, who is likely to make an immediate impact as a receiver while Crowell and West compete for early work. Although Crowell is favourite to start week one, Crowell has plenty of competition for touches. Crowell will compete for a backup running back role with the Browns in 2014. He must fight the likes of Edwin Baker, Dion Lewis and Chris to serve representatives representatives primær backs Ben Tate and Terrance West. Vest.
